Experts used to think that very young children were incapable of lying. However, more recent studies have shown that children begin to tell lies between the ages of two and four. Telling lies at this early stage doesn’t mean that the child will become a/an (1) _________ person who can’t be relied on. The child is not being (2) _________ and deliberately doing something naughty. Young children lie because they’ve discovered that their own thoughts are different from those of their parents. This allows them to avoid punishment or to say how they think things should be. However, very young children’s brains are too (3) _________ for them to realize that telling lies is wrong. Therefore, we can’t call them (4) _________ . It doesn’t matter how (5) _________ children’s stories are – telling lies at this age is simply part of growing up.
